CORE SKILL

Analyze Text Structure

Explain to students that each text has a specific structure that depends on the purpose of the text. Use an online or paper magazine or newspaper article to point out text structure by pointing to titles, headings, subheadings, captions, and other structural features. Have students work in pairs to choose their own article and discuss its text structure.

Summarize Information

Tell students that to summarize is to say or write a brief statement of a text's main points. Supply students with a brief memo, such as a portion of the one found here: <http://owl.english.purdue.edu/owl/resource/590/04/>. Work with students to underline key points in the first paragraph and summarize it on the board. Sample summary: The fall clothing line needs realignment based on current young adult TV and fashion preferences. The company should engage in more online marketing.

EXTENSION

Summarize Information

Explain to students that when they summarize a piece of writing, they look for the main points. Writing a summary is a way to understand the text. Refer to the job description for an administrative assistant on page 40. Guide students to see that the job description is a summary of a job's duties. Have students check each other's work. Remind them to write their summaries in their own words, except for any quotations they might include.

LESSON REVIEW

Write To Learn

Remind students that summarizing means retelling the main points in their own words. Have them jot down notes as they reread the article and use those notes to write their summaries. Then have students read their summaries to a partner. Listeners should check to make sure the speaker uses the main ideas of the headings in the summary.

GUIDED PRACTICE

Key Industries → Current News / Editorials

CORE SKILL

Evaluate Arguments

Explain to students that an argument is a reason given by a writer or speaker of why someone should do something. For example, an ad for a tire store might present an argument that their tires are better than other tires. It is up to the reader to evaluate whether the source of the information is reliable. Discuss with students the kinds of ads they think have reliable information, and ask them to explain their reasons.

Analyze Word Choice

Point out to students that writers can support their writing with factual information. Remind students that facts can be proven but opinions cannot. Give students an example of a car ad that says, "The car gets 40 miles to the gallon and gives the smoothest ride you'll ever have." Ask students to identify the fact (the car gets 40 miles to the gallon) and the opinion (it gives the smoothest ride you'll ever have) in the sentence. Discuss what makes one a fact and the other an opinion. (The car's mileage is provable, but no one can prove that a ride is the smoothest ever.)

EXTENSION

Distinguish Key Words

Ask students to think of a topic they would like to investigate on the Internet. Then have them each write a list of possible search words that they think will lead them to information about the topic. Have students do the searches and refine their search words. Have them continue to do this until they find three or four reliable sites

Digital Publications

Tell students that digital publishing has drastically changed the way people receive their news. Instead of listening to the radio, watching the nightly news on TV, or waiting until the next day for a paper newspaper to arrive, people can now access news 24 hours a day online. Work with students to locate articles about an appropriate current event. Encourage them to study the length, features, and information in the articles they are comparing. Have volunteers present their comparisons to the class.
